Putting Teeth in Public Health

Dr. Lynn Mouden has been called a communist, fascist and even the minion of the devil. That’s on a good day.

As the director of the Arkansas Health Department’s Office of Oral Health, this UNC School of Public Health graduate has seen his share of concerned citizens questioning the statewide effort to fluoridate the water. “You’re not going to convince some of them. They work on emotion, not science,” says Mouden, who earned his doctor of dental surgery at the University of Missouri-Kansas City in 1975 and his master’s in health policy and administration from Carolina in 1994.

Instead, Mouden and his four-person staff have concentrated on crisscrossing the state, meeting with local officials, one community at a time. In fact, he says, he’s been to more city council meetings than he can remember. But the work is paying off. Local water system participation was at 49 percent when he arrived. It’s now at 64 percent and getting closer to the 75 percent goal.

Mouden’s accomplishments look all the more impressive considering he started in Arkansas in 1999 with no budget or staff. Using his savvy political and leadership skills, he aligned himself with supportive legislators who developed and passed a statute requiring state oral health program participation. “Seventy-five percent of all physical abuse signs occur in the head, neck and mouth areas,” says Mouden. “And yet, less than one percent of dentists were responsible for reporting such abuse.”

Mouden’s interest in family violence was driven largely during his annual leave reorganizations. “At one point, I talked to dentists from other towns in the state and asked if they were seeing what I was seeing, and they said they weren’t,” he says. “That got me thinking. Why am I seeing it in Weston and it wasn’t being seen anywhere else?”

He discovered that abuse wasn’t really more prevalent in Weston but that dentists in other towns were missing the signs in their young patients. So, joining forces with a dental benefits carrier, Delta Dental of Arkansas, Mouden developed the educational material for PANDA and started spreading the word. “I just took it upon myself to make it a personal mission.”

Now with 45 state and 12 international programs, PANDA has proven to be the driving force behind dentists and others doing a better job of recognizing and reporting abuse and neglect. “We are truly blessed to have Lynn Mouden’s experience and capabilities as our leader in improving oral health for all Arkansans,” says Ed Choate, president and chief executive officer of Delta Dental of Arkansas. “Through his efforts, we have greater awareness, understanding and oral health treatment for those most in need in our state.”

There’s no slowing this high achiever. Mouden has continued to expand the PANDA program, both in the United States and abroad, and to promote a “train the trainers” component to the program that he developed largely during his annual leave time. Mouden says it’s worth it, knowing he’s helped save lives.

Know how to recognize child abuse and neglect

Warning signs:
- Repeated injuries, or injuries in various stages of healing
- Inappropriate behavior
- Neglected appearance or hygiene
- Parents that are extremely strict or super-critical of the child

General risk factors:
- History of drug or alcohol abuse within the family
- Severe stress—economic, lifestyle, or as a result of disasters
- Lack of a support network or isolation (e.g., single parent families, few close friends, no relatives nearby, geographic isolation, inability to or fear of interacting with neighbors)
- Other forms of family violence within the home (spousal or partner abuse, abuse or neglect of elders)
- History of a parent having been abused as a child

If you suspect a child is being abused or neglected, call the child protective services or law enforcement agency in your area. Remember—reporting is not an accusation. It is a call for help. For more information, visit www.healthyarkansas.com/OralHealth/panda/panda_index.htm, or contact Dr. Lynn Mouden at lynncouncilors@arkansas.gov or 501-661-2195.

© DR. LYNN MOUDEN

Through his efforts, we have greater awareness, understanding and oral health treatment for those most in need in our state.

Coalition of 38 organizations and nonprofit groups advocate for oral health. “All of that has been significant because we’ve been able to continue despite several major budget crises and two departmental reorganizations,” he says.

Mouden, however, is perhaps best known for a national and international program called PANDA—Prevent Abuse and Neglect through Dental Awareness. PANDA trains dentists and other health professionals to recognize victims of family violence and provide appropriate intervention. “All of that has been significant because of the statewide effort to fluoridate the water,” Mouden says. “But the work is paying off. Local water system participation was at 49 percent when he arrived. It’s now at 64 percent and getting closer to the 75 percent goal.”

Alum spearheads Arkansas’ water fluoridation efforts; founds PANDA program to train dentists worldwide to recognize and report abuse

Dr. Lynn Mouden is the founder of the international program, PANDA—Prevent Abuse and Neglect through Dental Awareness. The program trains dentists and other health professionals to recognize victims of family violence and provide appropriate intervention. Mouden is director of the Arkansas Health Department’s Office of Oral Health and holds a master’s in health policy and administration from UNC.

“Putting Teeth in Public Health” by Gene Pinder
Dr. Lynn Mouden has been called a community leader, a political strategist and even a family advocate. That’s on a good day.

As the director of the Arkansas Health Department’s Office of Oral Health, this UNC School of Public Health graduate has seen his share of concerned citizens questioning the statewide effort to fluoridate the water. “You’re not going to convince some of them. They work on emotion, not science,” says Mouden, who earned his doctor of dental surgery at the University of Missouri-Kansas City in 1975 and his master’s in health policy and administration from Carolina in 1994. Instead, Mouden and his four-person staff have concentrated on crisscrossing the state, meeting with local officials, one community at a time. In fact, he says he’s been to more city council meetings than he can remember. But the work is paying off. Local water system participation was at 49 percent when he arrived. It’s now at 64 percent and getting closer to the statewide effort to fluoridate the water. That’s on a good day.

Mouden’s accomplishments look all the more impressive considering he started in Arkansas in 1999 with no budget or staff. Using his savvy political and leadership skills, he aligned himself with supportive legislators who developed and passed a statute requiring the state ornal health program. He also built a coalition of 38 organizations and nonprofit groups to advocate for oral health. “All of that has been significant because we’ve been able to continue despite several major budget crises and two departmental reorganizations,” he says.

Mouden, however, is perhaps best known for a national and international program called PANDA—Prevent Abuse and Neglect through Dental Awareness. PANDA trains dentists and other health professionals to recognize victims of family violence and provide appropriate intervention. “Seventy-five percent of all physical abuse signs occur in the head, neck and mouth areas,” says Mouden. “And yet, less than one percent of dentists were responsible for reporting such abuse.”

Mouden’s interest in family violence was strengthened at UNC while taking courses in the School of Public Health’s executive master’s program. However, it was seeing and reporting actual cases of abuse while he was a practicing dentist in the small Missouri town of Weston that really got his attention. “At one point, I talked to dentists from other towns in the state and asked if they were seeing what I was seeing, and they said they weren’t,” he says. “That got me thinking. Why am I seeing it in Weston and it wasn’t being seen anywhere else?”

He discovered that abuse wasn’t really more prevalent in Weston but that dentists in other towns were missing the signs in their young patients. So, joining forces with a dental benefits carrier, Delta Dental of Missouri, Mouden developed the educational material for PANDA and started spreading the word. “I just took it upon myself to make it a personal mission.”

Now with 45 state and 12 international programs, PANDA has proven to be the driving force behind dentists and others doing a better job of recognizing and reporting abuse and neglect. “We are truly blessed to have Lynn Mouden’s experience and capabilities as our leader in improving oral health for all Arkansans,” says Ed Choate, president and chief executive officer of Delta Dental of Arkansas. “Through his efforts, we have greater awareness, understanding and oral health treatment for those most in need in our state.”

There’s no slowing this high achiever. Mouden has continued to expand the PANDA program, both in the United States and abroad, and to promote a “train the trainers” component to the program that he developed largely during his annual leave time. Mouden says it’s worth it, knowing he’s helped save lives.

Through his efforts, we have greater awareness, understanding and oral health treatment for those most in need in our state.

Dr. Lynn Mouden is the founder of the international program, PANDA—Prevent Abuse and Neglect through Dental Awareness. The program trains dentists and other health professionals to recognize victims of family violence and provide appropriate intervention. Mouden is director of the Arkansas Health Department’s Office of Oral Health and holds a master’s in health policy and administration from UNC.

Know how to recognize child abuse and neglect

Warning signs:

- Repeated injuries, or injuries in various stages of healing
- Inappropriate behavior
- Neglected appearance or hygiene
- Parents that are extremely strict or super-critical of the child

General risk factors:

- History of drug or alcohol abuse within the family
- Severe stress—economic, lifestyle, or as a result of disasters
- Lack of a support network or isolation (e.g., single parent families, few close friends, no relatives nearby, geographic isolation, inability to or fear of interacting with neighbors)
- Other forms of family violence within the home (spousal partner abuse, abuse or neglect of elders)
- History of a parent having been abused as a child

If you suspect a child is being abused or neglected, call the child protective services or law enforcement agency in your area. Remember—it is reporting not an accusation. It is a call for help. For more information, visit www.healthyarkansas.com/Oral_Health/panda/panda_index.htm, or contact Dr. Lynn Mouden at lynn.mouden@arkansas.gov or 501-661-2595.

© Dr. Lynn Mouden

—By Gene Pinder