PROFESSIONAL INTERESTS:

I am public health scientist, whose research focuses on the development, implementation, evaluation, and dissemination of interventions (including behavioral, biomedical, and structural/policy interventions) that are based on community needs and priorities in both rural and urban settings. My research explores health disparities, focusing on sexual health, HIV, and sexually transmitted disease (STD) prevention, and other public health priorities, including substance use and obesity, among vulnerable communities both in the US and internationally. I have extensive experience working with Latino communities, adolescents, persons with HIV and

AIDS, men of color, self-identifying gay and bisexual men, other men who have sex with men (MSM), transgender persons, and women.

I have strong skills in both quantitative and qualitative data collection and analysis methods; innovative approaches to multi-level interventions; community-capacity development; community-based participatory research (CBPR); the application of behavioral theory; community engagement; photovoice as a methodology of participatory-action research (PAR); natural helper, lay health advisor, and social network interventions; the exploration of socio-cultural determinants of health; and Internet and social media research, including data collection, intervention delivery, and evaluation. I served as PI of the team that developed, implemented, and evaluated the HoMBReS intervention. HoMBReS is a culturally congruent, Spanish-language HIV-prevention intervention for Latino men who are part of soccer team-based social networks. It is included in CDC's Compendium of Evidence-based HIV Behavioral Interventions as currently the only best evidence, community-level intervention (<http://www.cdc.gov/hiv/prevention/research/compendium/rr/hombres.html>).
